

Net Neutrality is far more than just a rule that benefits Netflix. It's an example of what the entire Internet has come to represent. The Internet is not just a way for "consumers" to interact with "businesses." It's also a way for people to connect with people. It's the modern equivalent to HAM radio and it's open to all to contribute and be involved.

I already pay for the bandwidth that I use. Whether I want to stream video from a service provider or I want to connect my computer systems to my friend's house to share computing resources, both should be equal. With weak Net Neutrality rules, using the Internet for personal use is outweighed in importance by corporate-sponsored data. But the Internet is so much more than consuming content from major providers. It's a telecommunications service. Each household on the Internet is capable of connecting with each other without a corporate middleman other than the ISP.

Revoking Title II status tries to say that Internet is not a common carrier, but how is it not? Any attempt to say otherwise is just an attempt to appease corporate interests. I call that corruption, plain and simple. "We the people" have spoken and you are our government, first and foremost.

Chad Garrett